THE SYDNEY MORNING HERALD.
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1903.
MR. REID AT BATHURST.

That excellent demonstration of federal and fiscal soundness which Mr. Reid's visit to Bathurst elicited, as reported this morning, will be remembered by the people of the State and of the Commonwealth with interest and admiration.

SIR JOHN SEE'S CLOSING SPEECH.
Though much to be regretted, Sir John See's speech on Thursday evening when dealing with the Opposition and the press was but in harmony with the tone of his remarks throughout the session.

Under our system of Parliamentary government the Opposition and the press have duties to perform but little less important than those of the Government. It is the function of the Opposition to point out the errors of the Government, and, if possible, secure the best results for the country.

Circumstances directed Mr. Reid's remarks at this meeting largely to a single channel—that of protection and monopoly. The essential conflict of interest between the unprivileged taxpayer and the privileged monopolist is a question which will be with us for ever.

It is an issue which every elector can understand. Either for himself or for his wife and family he finds that the price of the things he needs and cannot do without is raised by protection, the monopolists and domestic managers, know that even better than the wage-earners.

Of course, there is always the argument that the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence are far less than the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence.

But the fact is that the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence are far less than the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence.

But the fact is that the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence are far less than the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence.

But the fact is that the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence are far less than the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence.

But the fact is that the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence are far less than the percentages taken off the wage-earner's wages to secure him the means of subsistence.

time the Government was formed it was the highest, and it is solely the result of the new policy that it is now the lowest. The Government would have been supported in any efforts to maintain that credit; but it has not the slightest claim for consideration in any important aspect of its public works and financial administration.

Even the last modest proposal of the Treasurer asking for authority to borrow nearly two millions, and his efforts to get the money locally by raising the rates of interest and increasing the amounts of Savings Bank deposits on which such increased rates will be paid, show how utterly unworthy is the Government of any other support than that which waxes it of the folly of its public works and general financial policy.

The unworthy character of the Premier's closing speech may be gathered, also, from his statement that a hostile public press had sacrificed, or endeavored to sacrifice, the credit of the State for its own personal aggrandizement. In the extravagant expenditure of the Treasurer's speech, the Premier's statement is a masterpiece of indirectness, if not directly, mendacious.

People will read the newspapers in proportion as they have the means of obtaining them, and the expenditure of public money gave them ample funds, which contributed to newspaper receipts from subscriptions and advertisements. The Treasurer's speech, however, is a masterpiece of indirectness, if not directly, mendacious.

Our Melbourne correspondent writes: "A telegram announcing the death of Mr. Edward Adet, at Bordeaux, has been received by Messrs. Carter, Adet, and Co. The deceased was the founder of the firm in Melbourne, and was a member of the R.M.S. Sierra Leone Co. of the natural and manufactured goods of New South Wales. At the time in question the State was in the throes of a financial crisis."
